Highlights and notes

At 21, his freedom was removed for 18 months. "Through that experience, I learned mental stability and resilience. I had a chip on my shoulder and something to prove," said Chris.

So resilient that Black people in America generally have a DNA of resourcefulness because of the history of slavery and what we've overcome to get where we are today. "The folks who are the most oppressed through most policy literally have the built-in grit that is required for entrepreneurship," he shares. "That can be magnified when you use technology. Tech is the ultimate leveraged as it's really important for Black people to be technical."

Chris adds, "Tech culture is really American culture and American culture is Black culture. If we can influence America, then we have an ability to control the narrative that defines us."
